throughout Interior Alaska will be watched with interest by the public. Any move in the direction of improved service between Alaska and the States will be welcomed. It may not be possible entirely to eliminate the delays incident to the frequent breaking of the cable, but if these periods are only partially bridged by the wireless stations, they will have rendered a valuable service to Alaska and Alaskans, especially those residing in the Interior country.

So long as we are compelled to depend entirely upon the cable, there is little likilhood that messages will travel with greater certainty than they do at present. The cable is undependance, it is old and worn and rests on a bed of rocks which constantly threatens interruption. We need an auxiliary cable, but lacking that, we should have some other means of avoiding costly and annoying interruptions which are becoming more frequent as the years pass.
